Acknowledgments

Author Joe Palumbo was a teacher at Stephens Junior High School in the Long Beach Unified School District (California) at the time this unit was written. He wrote the unit as a Teacher Associate with the World History Institutes at the National Center for History. At the time the unit was first developed, Scott Waugh of UCLA’s Department of History was the Institute Director; Reuben Mekenye was Unit Editor; and Linda Symcox was Project Director. The Center also acknowledges Margaret McMillen for copyediting; Carole Collier Frick for mapwork; Leticia Zermeno for copyright-research activities; Alexey Root for proofreading; and Pamela Hamilton for assistance in desktop publishing. Special appreciation is due to Brenda Thomas, who created the original desktop layouts and unit designs, and brought the publication to completion.

Ross Dunn, Professor of History at San Diego State University, Director of World History at NCHS, and author of The Adventures of Ibn Battuta (California, 1986), edited this second printing of the unit with the assistance of David Vigilante, NCHS Associate Director. Marian McKenna Olivas prepared the revised layout and illustrative additions.
Table of Contents

Introduction

- Approach and Rationale .................................................. 1
- Content and Organization ................................................. 1

Teacher Background Materials

- Unit Overview .................................................................. 3
- Unit Context .................................................................... 4
- Correlation to the National Standards for World History .......... 4
- Unit Objectives .................................................................. 4
- Introduction to Mansa Musa: African King of Gold ............... 5
- Lesson Plans .................................................................... 6

Dramatic Moment .............................................................. 7

Lessons

- Lesson One: The Geography of Mali and Africa .................... 9
- Lesson Two: Mansa Musa and Mali ....................................... 14
- Lesson Three: Historical Bias ............................................ 39
- Lesson Four: Student Projects ............................................ 42

Annotated Bibliography .................................................... 44
INTRODUCTION

I. APPROACH AND RATIONALE

Mansa Musa: African King of Gold is one of over sixty teaching units published by the National Center for History in the Schools that are the fruits of collaborations between history professors and experienced teachers of both United States and World History. The units represent specific issues and dramatic episodes in history from which you and your students can pause to delve into the deeper meanings of these selected landmark events and explore their wider context in the great historical narrative. By studying crucial turning points in history, the student becomes aware that choices had to be made by real human beings, that those decisions were the result of specific factors, and that they set in motion a series of historical consequences. We have selected issues and dramatic moments that best bring alive that decision-making process. We hope that through this approach, your students will realize that history in an ongoing, open-ended process, and that the decisions they make today create the conditions of tomorrow’s history.

Our teaching units are based on primary sources, taken from government documents, artifacts, journals, diaries, newspapers, magazines, literature, contemporary photographs, paintings, and other art from the period under study. What we hope to achieve using primary source documents in these lessons is to remove the distance that students feel from historical events and to connect them more intimately with the past. In this way we hope to recreate for your students a sense of “being there,” a sense of seeing history through the eyes of the very people who were making decisions. This will help your students develop historical empathy, to realize that history is not an impersonal process divorced from real people like themselves. At the same time, by analyzing primary sources, students will actually practice the historian’s craft, discovering for themselves how to analyze evidence, establish a valid interpretation and construct a coherent narrative in which all the relevant factors play a part.

II. CONTENT AND ORGANIZATION

Within this unit, you will find: Teaching Background Materials, including Unit Overview, Unit Context, Correlation to the National Standards for History, Unit Objectives, and Introduction to Mansa Musa: African King of Gold; A Dramatic Moment; and Lesson Plans with Student Resources. This unit, as we have said above, focuses on certain key moments in time and should be used as a supplement to your customary course materials. Although these lessons are recommended for use by grades 7–12, they can be adapted for other grade levels.

The Teacher Background section should provide you with a good overview of the entire unit and with the historical information and context necessary to link the Dramatic Moment to the larger historical narrative. You may consult it for your own use, and you may choose to share it with students if they are of a sufficient grade level to understand the materials.

The Lesson Plans include a variety of ideas and approaches for the teacher which can be elaborated upon or cut as you see the need. These lesson plans contain student resources which accompany each lesson. The resources consist of primary source documents, handouts and student background materials, and a bibliography.

In our series of teaching units, each collection can be taught in several ways. You can teach all of the lessons offered on any given topic, or you can select and adapt the ones that best support your particular course needs. We have not attempted to be comprehensive or prescriptive in our offerings, but rather to give you an array of enticing possibilities for in-depth study, at varying grade levels. We hope that you will find the lesson plans exciting and stimulating for your classes. We also hope that your students will never again see history as a boring sweep of facts and meaningless dates but rather as an endless treasure of real life stories and an exercise in analysis and reconstruction.
I. Unit Overview

One of the greatest and most far-reaching empires of the later middle ages was in West Africa. The kingdom of Mali impressed both the Muslim and the Christian worlds with its wealth. One of Mali’s greatest leaders, the emperor Mansa Musa, awakened the world to Mali’s power on his pilgrimage to Mecca in 1324 when he spent and distributed so much gold that it deflated its price in Cairo for the next twelve years.

Several Arab scholars were so impressed by this man that they followed him back to Mali to investigate the empire. The writings of these scholars serve as the primary source documents for this unit. Through the examination, interpretation and synthesis of these writings, students will be able to analyze the people and culture of Mali, the role of the emperor, and the character of Mansa Musa himself.

The investigation of African kingdoms is crucial to a more complete understanding of world history. For too long Africa has been treated as the backwater of history with students and teachers alike having limited knowledge of this area. It will be a fascinating and enlightening project for students to learn about an African who fourteenth-century Europeans described as “the richest and most noble king in all the land.”

This unit challenges the idea that Africa was “a dark continent” and unknown to the outside world before the arrival of Europeans. It will show that strong, well-organized states existed in Africa long before European colonialism. Here, as in medieval Europe, the kings’ strength and respectability heavily depended on the material wealth they possessed. They shared this wealth among their loyal followers, (often chiefs, lords, or military leaders), who in turn shared it among those they ruled or commanded.

It is important also in presenting this topic to remind students that the rule of the kings was by no means democratic as we understand democracy today. Any differences between various reigns were due to the personality or the unique forces in operation within individual societies. The focus should thus be on critical appreciation rather than blind glorification of the past, as the past was not faultless.
II. Unit Context

This unit would fit best during a study of the late middle ages (1300–1517). It would be most effective if it were placed in the chronological framework of events occurring in Europe, the Mediterranean region, and the Muslim world and not set apart as a topic exclusive to itself. If time permits, an investigation into both the kingdoms of Ghana and Songhay, which flourished before and after Mali, would be helpful, although the unit can be taught alone. It is essential, however, that students first study the rise of Islam since Mali was an empire whose ruling class had converted to Islam.

This unit will also help students understand the spread of Islam beyond the Middle East, as well as the patterns of long-distance trade that linked Mali to the wider Afro-Eurasian world.

III. Correlation to National History Standards

This unit likewise integrates a number of specific Historical Thinking Skills including: reconstruct patterns of historical succession and duration (Standard 1: Chronological Thinking); draw upon visual and literary sources (Standard 2: Historical comprehension); formulate historical questions and obtain historical data from a variety of sources (Standard 4: Historical Research); and marshal evidence of antecedent circumstances (Standard 5: Historical Issues—Analysis and Decision Making).

IV. Unit Objectives

♦ Understand the importance of geography in the study of history.

♦ Read and interpret primary source documents by Arab scholars who visited or learned about Mali in the fourteenth century.

♦ Differentiate between historical facts and historical interpretations.
IV. Introduction to Mansa Musa: African King of Gold

The great political problem in the western region of the Western Sudan was how to bring peace and order into the confusion that had followed the collapse of Ghana. The problem was tackled, and largely solved, by a Mali emperor whose name became more famous even than that of Sundiata, the king who established the new empire of Mali. This was Mansa Kankan Musa, who carried Mali to the height of its power and enjoyed a reputation at home and abroad as an able and pious king. Mansa was his title and means “ruler” or “sultan.” Musa is Arabic for “Moses.”

Mansa Musa came to power around 1312. By the time of his death in 1337, Mali had grown into one of the largest empires in the world. What Mansa Musa accomplished was to repeat the success of Ghana on a more ambitious scale. He already had firm control of the trade routes to those lands. Now he brought the lands of the Middle Niger under his control and enclosed the key trading cities of Timbuktu and Gao within his empire. He imposed his rule on southern Saharan trading cities like Walata, and pushed his armies northward until their influence was felt as far as the salt deposits of Taghaza in the north central desert. He sent them eastward beyond Gao to the very frontiers of Hausaland (today northern Nigeria) and westward down the Gambia and Senegal River valleys to the Atlantic Ocean.

Through twenty-five successful years Mansa Musa progressively enclosed a large part of the central and western regions of the Western Sudan within a single system of law and order. He did this so well that Ibn Battuta, traveling through Mali some twelve years after the great emperor’s death, could find “complete and general safety in the land.”

Muslim merchant groups, notably the Dyula and Wangara grew in strength with the widening power of Mali. Their trading operations began to spread into many parts of West Africa, pushing their enterprises far down into the forest lands as well as across the plains of the north.

This was also a period of Islamic expansion in the Western Sudan. Unlike the rulers of Ghana, Mansa Musa accepted the new religion. Many members of his royal court, as well as provincial chiefs and officers, followed him. So did some of their subjects. Other rulers and peoples remained loyal to their own religions, but Islam steadily widened its influence. More and more West Africans went on pilgrimages to Mecca. More and more North Africans and Egyptians visited Mali. Trade and Islam grew together, and both prospered.

The year of Musa’s death is often given as 1332. But the great North African historian, Ibn Khaldun, whose writings remain the best source of information on the dates of the rulers of Mali, has recorded that Musa was still alive in 1337.

Mansa Musa himself made a pilgrimage to Mecca in 1324. His journey through Egypt was long remembered with amazement because Musa took with him so much gold and gave away so many golden gifts that “the people of Cairo earned incalculable sums.” So lavish was Musa with his gifts that he upset the value of goods on the Cairo market. Gold became more plentiful and therefore less valued, so prices rose accordingly. The North African scholar al-Umari, who lived in Cairo a few years after Mansa Musa’s visit declared that of all the Muslim rulers of West Africa Musa was “the most powerful, the richest, the most fortunate, the most feared by his enemies, and the most able to do good to those around him.” Behind these words of praise one may glimpse the power and reputation that Mali drew from its control of a very wide region of trade in precious goods such as salt, ivory, kola nuts, and especially gold.

Under Mansa Musa, Mali ambassadors and royal agents were established in Morocco, Egypt, and elsewhere. North African and Egyptian scholars visited Mali’s capital. On returning from pilgrimage, Mansa Musa brought with him a number of learned men from Egypt. One of them, called al-Saheli, is said to have designed new mosques at Gao and Timbuktu and built a palace for the emperor. The fashion of building houses of brick became popular among wealthy people in the cities of the Western Sudan.

Niani, the capital of this empire, has long since disappeared. Yet as late as the sixteenth century, the Moroccan traveler Leo Africanus could still describe it as a place of “six thousands hearths,” and its inhabitants as “the most civilized, intelligent, and respected” of all the peoples of the Western Sudan.

V. Lesson Plans

1. The Geography of Mali and Africa
2. Mansa Musa and Mali
3. Historical Bias
4. Student Projects